An 1800 word essay that examines the right of individuals to discriminate peacefully against anyone for any reason.

Too many citizens have forgotten (if they ever knew) that the only proper function of government is protect our rights — our lives and our selves — from the coercive transgressions of others.

These unsophisticated or intellectually lazy people are unaware of and apparently unable to discriminate (i.e., recognize the difference) between having a “right (having the option or ability) to do X” versus judging “action X as being right (morally correct).”

As an adult, you have the right to: eat too much, drink excessively, ingest drugs, be sexually promiscuous, lie to friends and family members (in most contexts), not work, avoid housework, and a plethora of other activities. Yet these same self-destructive behaviors are not morally right for you to engage in, i.e., you should not be doing these on a consistent basis since you may harm yourself and, perhaps, those close to you.

Each and every one of us has the right to be wrong, to make incorrect (peaceful) choices and/or engage in incorrect actions we would be better off avoiding. Indeed, we can be unjust in our dealings with others (such as in breaking a promise to a friend) as long as we do not violate their rights (do not threaten or use force to obtain our goals).
